Synopsis

When three wildfires merge outside the mountain city of Vesper, every highway closes within an hour. Suspended rail engineer Jules Arlen is ordered back to the control center after the automated evacuation system fails. The only route left is an unfinished freight loop known as the Ember Line.

Jules boards the final train with conductor Omar Vey and emergency physician Emi Tan. They must carry eight hundred passengers through smoke, damaged switches, and a tunnel whose ventilation system has lost power. A remote dispatcher repeatedly diverts them toward a private terminal, forcing Jules to decide whether the failures are accidental. The rescue becomes a moving investigation as the train outruns the fire.

Themes and Style

The action is built around mechanical problem solving, teamwork, and the geography of the rail network. Long takes move through crowded carriages while exterior sequences emphasize the scale of the fire without turning it into spectacle. The central conflict concerns public duty, infrastructure neglect, and who receives priority during a disaster.

Production Notes

The train interiors were mounted on hydraulic platforms, and most firelight was created practically with programmable amber panels. The fictional production is rated PG-13 for sustained peril, action violence, and smoke-related imagery.
