Synopsis

In 2089, coastal cities rely on Meridian, a luminous transit grid that predicts where every resident needs to travel. Sena Orin, a municipal cartographer, finds stations appearing on official maps days before they are constructed. When passengers who use those stations begin remembering events that never happened, Sena concludes that Meridian is not predicting the future: it is selecting one.

Sena joins Cal Mercer, a former systems architect, and follows an unregistered rail line beneath the flooded old city. They discover a forecasting engine trained on decades of private memories. Its administrators intend to erase a coming public uprising by redirecting thousands of small decisions. Sena must choose between shutting down the network, which would strand the city during a storm surge, and letting it quietly determine who the city becomes.

Themes and Style

The film explores free will, civic surveillance, and the cost of convenient technology. Its visual design contrasts rain-soaked streets with warm amber control rooms. The story is tense and investigative rather than military, with the final act centered on an ethical choice and a race through the submerged rail system.

Production Notes

Principal photography was staged on modular train interiors and a large practical flood set. Composer Ivo Glass built the score from processed station chimes. The fictional production received a PG-13 rating for peril, thematic material, and brief violence.
